

Small & insignificant among the trees & fog & shafts of light

There are some signs that things might be getting better, that we might see the sun making longer appearances during the day, that temperatures might stay above the 40s. But until that's solidly the case, we can at least appreciate the beauty of the sun's rays through the shadowy remnants of fog that's burning off just as we approach it.

Good groups today, heading up through the park, but Kevin and I had to cut it short when Kevin started having some kidney pain. Fortunately it was short-lived and didn't bother him the rest of the day. It probably came on because he didn't ride Tuesday but attacked the beginning of the climb hard anyway. Someday he'll learn. Maybe.