

A pretty awesome Thanksgiving Day ride

Simultaneously more-picturesque and more-difficult to photograph this morning, as the cold air (about 37 degrees) created a slight fog coming off the lake. The weather can be a bit of a crapshoot for the annual Thanksgiving Day ride, but today, while perhaps a bit cold at times, was a great day to be out on a bike.

Just a few of us this time; myself, Kevin (my son; the pilot's in Australia), Karen and Lanier. It was the usual Sunday routing; up Old La Honda (where the other three rode on ahead while I was still trying to find my legs), the duck pond detour (ALWAYS worthwhile and this morning particularly so, with the mist coming off the pond and a large number of ducks), Haskins (the other three seemed to have mellowed out a bit here so I had not too much trouble hanging on), then breakfast/early lunch in Pescadero. Temperature on the way out ranged from 36 to 43 degrees, until we got near the coast where it warmed up nicely to 56.

Kevin and his tacos Lanier is a worthy addition to our rides; he's a time trial specialist and pulled us very strongly into Pescadero. Strongly enough that both Kevin and I had new personal bests for that segment, even though we, or at least I, had nothing to do with the effort.

The coast WAS clear! And warm. Food at the Mexican restaurant that's part of the gas station in Pescadero is unexpectedly good and very reasonably priced. Not to mention the only game in town on Thanksgiving, when the rest of the businesses are closed! Kevin quickly knocked down two tacos; I ate one.

Stage Road... slight headwind, not bad. The coast? Beautiful and clear. This time of year, it's very common for the weather to be much nicer (warmer) along the coast than anywhere else. Often more clear too! Obviously no exception today.

Tunitas? I'd love to say it was fun, but it was... OK, it was fun. We weren't in a rush, although Lanier was clearly in the best shape of anyone, doing one minute intervals every five minutes, and then circling back to the rest of us. Impressive! Even Kevin wasn't interested in trying to duplicate his efforts.
