

Sure seems like more people are running red lights these days

This is Jefferson & Hudson, on my way home from work. I'm stopped at the red light and notice quite a bit of noise off to the left; I look over and see a big white truck gunning it, toward the intersection, with the light already red in its direction. You can see this in the left photo above. The rest of the photo shows him flying through the intersection, with a green left turn lane signal allowing any cars that wished to plow into him. Amazingly, nobody did, from either direction. Apparently red-light running is so common these days that cars now just sit and wait a bit after the light turns green. Crazy world.